Conference of Rulers elects new King

● FROM PAGE 6

However, the deputy King does not automatically succeed to the throne in the event of the King's death or resignation. He only takes over until the Conference of Rulers elects a new successor.

The Ruler elected to be the Deputy King is the Ruler who is next on the list to become King.

The exception to the list will be if the Ruler is a minor, declined to accept the offer or is regarded as "unsuitable".

The Conference of Rulers in appointing the next King do not really "elect" the Ruler but consider the "suitability" of the Ruler concerned to be the next King.

For a particular Ruler to be considered unsuitable to exercise the powers of the King, a resolution by at least five of the other eight Rulers, must be passed.

There is no nomination or election. The King-elect therefore takes the appointment automatically, without requiring the consent of five Rulers, except unless the five ruled him as being "unsuitable".
